

Organic Waste Recycling & Surplus Food Recovery

Businesses and consumers in California toss nearly 6 million tons of food annually, according to the California Department of Food and Agriculture. When all that food gets dumped into landfills, it turns into methane, a greenhouse gas dozens of times more damaging to the climate than carbon dioxide. To help save the planet and feed more people, the state of California, along with hunger relief groups, are trying to find better ways to rescue and recycle (often perfectly edible) food before it's trashed.

California recently passed a series of legislation after setting State goals to reduce the disposal of organic waste by 75% by the year 2025 and to recover 20% of commercial edible food from the waste stream.

A closer look at the State mandates:

AB 827 - Requires recycling and organic waste bins to be easily visible and accessible to customers and staff disposing of food waste at restaurants and other food establishments.

AB 1826 – Requires businesses who generate two-cubic yards or more of solid waste per week to arrange for the collection and recycling of organic waste.

SB 1383 – Expands the requirements for organic waste recycling to all jurisdictions, including residential and multi-family properties, to sort and recycle their food waste. In addition, all commercial edible food, which is any unsold or served food that is fit for human consumption, even though the food may not be readily marketable due to appearance, age, freshness, grade, size, surplus or other conditions, must be diverted into programs that feed people facing food insecurity.
